Soda Can Problem

I have a can of soda that contains 355mL, according to its label. It is in the shape of a cylinder. I wonder whether there is a more "efficient" cylinder to hold this much liquid. What are the dimensions of the cylinder with least surface area that has this particular volume? How does this compare to the dimensions of a "standard" soda can? Why do you think this is so?